

Our second Conquest Concert was a blast. It was an awesome opportunity for our local churches to come together and reach out to the community, and united as one, give praise to God. With Transit, Tribe, and Called to One all playing under the same roof, we heard the variety of sounds that Woodstock and surrounding area has to offer.

The night opened up with a few videos (some which were made by our very own L41 media department) and then the band Transit took the stage. They played a rockin' line-up and ended off with a song that helped set the stage for the rest of the night. In between that and the next band was a Nooma video that helped show us that God protects us at all times. Taking the stage next was Tribe. Even though their style was much different from Transit, they still played with the same enthusiasm and the crowd still entered in with the same intensity.

Right after them was a testimony from Terry Pierson. She shared a bit about her life, and how she discovered the hard way that God's way is the only way, and gave an admonition to live the right way, right from the very beginning. Called to One played a bit of worship to open the front up for those who may have needed help finding direction. After that, Called to One ended the night off with a bang when they played a spiced up version of Darrel Evans' song, "Trading My Sorrows." All in all, it was an awesome night.
